200x

brand recognition, built from nothing

Situation. Engineer ApS was a brand-new consultancy with real technical depth and almost nobody who'd heard of it. That's a specific kind of frustrating: the skill is there, the work would be good, but none of it matters if the clients and partners who'd want it don't know you exist. A young firm has to be seen before it can win anything.

Task. The task was to build a brand people would actually recognise — across both the offline and online sides — and to turn the firm's engineering credibility into visible market presence, rather than leaving it as a well-kept secret.

Action. The brand was built deliberately and kept consistent. It started with a clear identity — a voice, a visual language, and a portfolio that led with concrete engineering outcomes instead of the vague "we deliver value" language everyone else uses. Then it ran across the channels that matter for this kind of firm — the website, LinkedIn, GitHub, in-person events — with every touchpoint saying the same thing rather than each drifting off on its own. The throughline was leading with real case studies and real results, so the credibility was something you could see evidence for, not just a claim.

Result. The founder reports a 200x increase in brand recognition from this work. This is the founder's account of the outcome. An independent brand-recognition measurement was not located; that absence does not disprove the reported result.
